Balderas Calls Out President Trump & Secretary DeVos for Turning their Backs on New Mexico Students

Albuquerque, NM - Today, Attorney General Hector Balderas sent a letter calling out the U.S. Department of Education for abdicating its responsibility to thousands of New Mexico student loan borrowers and their families by revoking critical reforms designed to help students avoid default and curtail loan servicer misconduct. The letter was sent today to Education Secretary Betsy DeVos in opposition to the Department's recent rollback of guidance intended to protect student loan borrowers and reform the student loan servicing industry.

"President Trump and Secretary DeVos have turned their backs on thousands of New Mexico student loan borrowers and their families," said Attorney General Balderas. "I will continue to use the full force of New Mexico law to crack down on predatory lenders, but the federal government must be accountable to New Mexico students as well."

The guidance, issued by the Department of Education last year, centered on helping borrowers get accurate information about their loans and repayment options, ensuring the consistency of service provided by student loan servicers, increasing servicer accountability, and enhancing transparency. Critically, these reforms aimed to improve borrowers' access to affordable loan repayment plans designed to help borrowers in distress avoid default. But the Department's action earlier this month has instead left student loan borrowers vulnerable to poor practices and abuses that the servicing reforms were intended to prevent.

As explained in today's letter, investigations and enforcement actions undertaken by state attorneys general and the CFPB have repeatedly uncovered student loan servicing misconduct. According to the letter, borrowers struggle under the weight of their student loan debt and federal student loan default rates are on the rise. In 2015, the CFPB estimated that more than 25 percent of student loan borrowers were delinquent or in default on a student loan.

"Many such borrowers would benefit greatly from entering income-driven repayment plans but are prevented from doing so by student loan servicer misconduct and misinformation," the letter states.

Joining today's letter are the attorneys general of Massachusetts, Illinois, California, Connecticut, Hawaii, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, and the District of Columbia, as well as the Executive Director of the Office of Consumer Protection of Hawaii.

Re: Revocation of Student Loan Borrower Protections

Dear Secretary DeVos,

We, the undersigned Attorneys General of Massachusetts, Illinois, California, Connecticut, Hawaii, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, and the District of Columbia, as well as the Executive Director of the Office of Consumer Protection of Hawaii, write to express our profound concern regarding the Department of Education's revocation of critical student loan servicing reforms. The memoranda withdrawn by the Department on April 11, 2017 provided guidance designed to reform the student loan servicing industry in order to protect student loan borrowers and help these borrowers find affordable ways to repay their debts and avoid default.¹ At a time when the need for common-sense federal student loan servicing reforms is undeniable, the Department's decision to roll back essential protections imperils millions of student loan borrowers and families.

Investigations and enforcement actions undertaken by the state attorneys general have repeatedly revealed the havoc that student loan servicers' poor practices and servicing failures wreak on the lives of borrowers. In 2016, the Massachusetts Attorney General entered an assurance of discontinuance with ACS Education Services, a national student loan servicer, over allegations that it failed to properly process struggling borrowers' applications for income-driven repayment plans, among other violations of state and federal law.² In January of 2017, the Illinois and Washington Attorneys General, along with the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau ("CFPB") filed suit against Navient, one of the largest servicers of federal student loans, for widespread abuses of student borrowers across all aspects of its business, including student loan origination, loan servicing, and debt collection.³

These lawsuits alleged that struggling borrowers nationwide complained that Navient consistently failed to assist them. When borrowers struggling to pay their federal student loans called Navient for help, the company steered them into excessive forbearances that increased the overall cost of their loans instead of telling borrowers about federal income-based repayment plans.

Our offices regularly hear from borrowers who did not receive the necessary guidance from their loan servicers to make sound decisions about repayment and consequently face ballooning loan balances, escalating monthly payments, credit score ruin, defaults, and large collection fees.

The guidance revoked by the Department was designed to improve the accuracy of information provided to borrowers by servicers, ensure that borrowers are treated consistently, and increase servicer accountability in order to correct persistent failures. Especially concerning is the withdrawal of guidance intended to ensure that servicers' past performance will be the most important noncost factor considered by the Department in awarding future servicing contracts. Critically, the rescinded reforms aim to improve access to income-driven repayment plans designed to help borrowers in distress avoid default. This effort could not be more important. Facing a mounting student debt crisis, borrowers struggle under the weight of their student loan debt and federal student loan default rates continue to rise. In 2015, the CFPB estimated that more than 25 percent of student loan borrowers were delinquent or in default on a student loan.⁴ Many such borrowers would benefit greatly from entering income-driven repayment plans but are prevented from doing so by student loan servicer misconduct and misinformation. In its 2015 report, the CFPB identified troubling student loan servicer practices—including paperwork processing errors and failure to provide accurate information—that discourage the use of income-driven repayment plans.⁵ By reforming servicer incentives and strengthening consumer protections, the rescinded guidance sought to eliminate the loan servicing failures that keep borrowers from entering affordable repayment plans.

The stated rationale provided by the Department for its withdrawal of these servicing reforms is to “negate any impediment, ambiguity or inconsistency” in the approach to the student loan servicing procurement process.⁶ But the effect of the Department's action is to leave student loan borrowers mired in ambiguity and inconsistency that the servicing reforms were intended to prevent. Among the many reforms the Department has seen fit to revoke are the common-sense requirements (i) that servicers apply borrower overpayments to loans bearing the highest interest rates unless the borrower instructs otherwise, and (ii) that servicers inform borrowers of income-driven repayment options before placing borrowers in forbearance or deferment. These servicing standards would help borrowers manage their loans, save money, and make informed decisions about their repayment options. The Department's stated rationale does not justify summarily denying student borrowers such basic protections.⁷

Through its choice of student loan servicers and its creation of servicing standards, the Department plays a central role in determining whether or not borrowers will be able to successfully repay their federal student loan debt. The guidance revoked by the Department was expressly designed to protect borrowers and correct pervasive student loan servicing failures that harm student loan borrowers and their families. By revoking these critical protections, the Department has abdicated its responsibility to student loan borrowers.

We urge you to reconsider immediately.
